designer/photographer will create a 'working' copy of the shoot 'in-camera'. This is a recent change to practices that sooner or later we'll all be forgetting. Going back to the simpler times, the generally accepted way of working in production was to create a 'scratch copy' of each shot, then add more and more layers and levels to it until it was perfect. Afterwards, the original should be kept. Because this way of working is still practiced today, it has become normal to have few or no working files. It may prove beneficial to have a work copy during a project and it makes sense to learn how to use Lightroom only if you have that option. You can of course still work with a program such as Photoshop but it is hard to justify the price of the program. Canon release the EF300 firmware update before release of the camera. This firmware release will allow for some of the more advanced features that we've seen in Canon's firmware, updated as a firmware update when you turn the camera on. At Canon's press conference, a Canon representative stated that the firmware update will include the following new features: It's a good idea to spend time experimenting with Photoshop. There will be times where you will come up with a concept that takes your breath away, one that will sit in your computer bag for years. Upon receiving this print, you will start to realize that it was much too small for the wall, a little too intense for the projector screen or a bit too bold for your Facebook profile. Simply put, these images are a little too unique, too down-to-earth, or just a bit too bold; that's why it's so important that you understand what a gamma curve is, test all your color profiles, view your images in a print museum and consider your medium. Like it or not, your pictures are going to be printed, propped up in a binder, and eventually hung on a wall, be it a gallery, your living room, or a commercial space. e3d0a04c9c
